The land bequeathed by Benjamin Syms is across the road, north east of this location. The exact school house locations are presently unknown, but existing records show that in 1760 and in 1805 it was near the corner indicated. Earlier, when waterways were the primary means of transportation, the school house may have been located near the other indicated site, where there is high land near water.

In colonial times, the low areas covered with marsh grass were used to graze cattle and the grass was also cut for "salt hay".
