PREFACE

The existing records in the Virginia State Archives related to the goods and services impressed in Elizabeth City County (now the city of Hampton) during the latter part of the Revolutionary War have been transcribed to make them more readily available to researchers. Since almost no records normally kept at the county court house are known to have survived for the years 1771 through 1783, these claim records are an important insight to the activities in the county during the Revolution. The public service claim records are in four categories: (1) the certificates or receipts given when the goods or services were impressed (few of these have survived), (2) the lists of claimants for each county (none have survived for Elizabeth City County), (3) the Court Booklet of claims certified by a special county court, and (4) the Commissioner’s Books, or record of claim payments.

Most of these claims were made for provisions or services impressed in 1780 and 1781 during the British campaign to subdue the southern colonies, which finally ended with the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in October, 1781. Prior to this campaign, and after the forces under Dunmore (the last Royal Governor of Virginia) left the Chesapeake Bay area in August of 1776, Tidewater Virginia was little molested by the British. Although men from Elizabeth City County fought in the Continental Army and particularly on the patriot naval and privateer ships, farms in the county produced crops, and in spite of the British efforts to blockade the coast, Hampton was a major center of trade with Europe and the West Indies.

The war returned to Virginia in May, 1779, when a British force occupied Portsmouth for sixteen days and captured or destroyed numerous ships as well as large quantities of supplies, ordnance, and tobacco stored in the area. In 1779 Georgia was the first southern state to be reconquered, and the conflict rapidly spread northward. Virginia contributed heavily in both men and supplies to the defense of the states south of her borders. When Charleston, South Carolina, fell on 12 May 1780, most of the Virginia Continental Army and its supplies were captured, and several units of the Virginia militia were routed as the British, under Cornwallis, pressed inland and northward.

Threatened by invasion, Virginia was almost defenseless and financially unable to buy supplies for her militia or to rebuild her component of the Continental Army. After the fall of Charleston, the Virginia General Assembly passed an act providing for the first widespread impressment “of provisions and other necessaries for the use of the army.” (Military commanders had been given very limited authority to impress goods and services as early as May, 1777.) Governor Thomas Jefferson was empowered to appoint a commissioner in each county to search for, to impress, and to store “surplus” supplies. The commissioners could also impress wagons, etc., to transport the supplies to storage centers. This activity was primarily limited to storable foods and distilled “spirits,” to the surplus not needed by a family until the following December, and to one-half of a merchant’s stock on hand.1

In October, 1780, a small British force again occupied Portsmouth for several weeks and raided the nearby coastal areas. The authority to impress provisions expired during this critical time, but was reinstated retroactively by the General Assembly in November. This time, a state commissioner was authorized with a deputy in each county. Also, “hay, fodder and other forage,” up to one-sixth of the quantity in possession of any person, was added to the list of applicable items.2

Early in January of 1781 a larger force under Benedict Arnold reoccupied Portsmouth and raided inland as far as Richmond. On the ninth of January a detachment of this force routed the Virginia militia being assembled at Charles City Court House. Some of the militia units were from Elizabeth City County. The French fleet forced Arnold to leave Virginia in February, but an even larger British force returned in April. Cornwallis, commanding the British southern campaign, entered Virginia in May, and the combined forces ravaged Virginia as far west as Charlottesville. Because of the large-scale capture and destruction of supplies by the British, and because of the pressing needs of the local militia units, Governor Jefferson found it increasingly difficult to supply the forces being assembled under Lafayette to oppose Cornwallis. Hence, the May, 1781 session of the General Assembly gave the Governor wider latitude in the types of property that could be impressed and specifically included “boats or other vessels and their crews.”3

General Thomas Nelson, Jr., succeeded Jefferson as governor in June of 1781, and he vigorously raised provisions for the armed forces without much concern for the limitations set by the Assembly. On 31 August 1781, he ordered Commodore James Barron, in command of the Virginia naval forces, to commandeer all available craft and to collect provisions at Trebells Landing near Carters Grove preparatory to the arrival of the Northern Army under General Washington. Soon afterwards, Timothy Pickering, Commissary-General of the Continental Army, established his headquarters at Trebells Landing, and this became the principal supply depot for the siege of Yorktown.

1Henings, Statues at Large, Vol. 10, p. 233.
2Ibid., p. 344.
3Ibid., p. 413.
During the months before Cornwallis was "bottled up" in Yorktown, the militia and volunteers of Elizabeth City County who were not fighting under Lafayette were called out several times to oppose marauding parties from the British ships in Hampton Roads. On one of these occasions about forty British soldiers under Captain Brown landed at Newport News Point and foraged until opposed by a company of volunteers under Captain Edward Mallory, replacing his brother, Francis, who had been captured by the British a few weeks earlier. Brown was wounded and captured, but because he was well treated before he later died, the British released Francis Mallory. However, shortly after his release, Mallory was killed near Big Bethel on 8 March 1781, when about forty men under him and William Roscoe Wilson Curle engaged about two hundred British soldiers under Colonel Dundas, who were sent to destroy the post at the Halfway House. During the siege of Yorktown, Elizabeth City County evidently became a beehive of activity. A number of troops were stationed in the county, and the courthouse was taken over and used as a hospital.

In November of 1781, after the surrender of the British forces at Yorktown, the Virginia General Assembly passed an act declaring all impressments, with few exceptions, to be illegal. 1 At the same session the county courts were directed to receive and certify all claims resulting from impressments and to submit "a fair transcript of their proceedings in the business aforesaid to be laid before the succeeding assembly." 2

With only a faint hope of future payment, the farmers and merchants of Elizabeth City County were undoubtedly severely strained to supply provisions for their local militia and the Virginia forces, and later for the French-American army at Yorktown. Although it is evident from the list of claims that many of the county residents were able to supply rather large quantities of provisions, some could only furnish a calf for beef or a few bushels of corn and a piece of "bacon" (any cured pork). The seventy-two bushels of potatoes and five bushels of peas (probably dried) furnished by George Wythe were probably a welcome change to the soldiers' diet of beef and cornbread (and rum) as indicated by many of the claims.

Although they were not all submitted at the same time, all of the certified claim lists had been given consecutive page numbers. Cary Selden, the clerk who wrote most of the claim lists, used a legible but very small handwriting and was therefore able to get a considerable number of items on each page. The marks X, √, and √, as well as the notations "paid" and "pd." that appear with many of the items were made with other pens after the clerk wrote the lists. The marks do not appear to be related to the rather large number of arithmetical errors. The X and √ marks in the Commissioner's Book were also made by a different pen.

An effort was made to transcribe these records just as they were written except for minor changes made to aid the typist. Where symbols were used for words or abbreviations such as "per," "etc.," and "lbs.," the word or abbreviation is typed. When an indication was given that a word was abbreviated or contracted, the appropriate present-day period or apostrophe is used. For example, Elizê is typed Eliza. and Com:rs is typed Com'rs. Underlined letters or words are doubtful because they were hard to decipher, and underlined question marks indicate words, etc., that could not be read.
